People living with mental health conditions are people. They have people they love, activities they enjoy, and dreams for their lives. As people, they deserve to be treated with dignity, and under the law they have rights and protections. Unfortunately, it has long been the case that individuals with mental health conditions are among the most abused and discriminated against in our country.

Mental health and law intersect in a multitude of ways. The two disciplines ought to constantly inform and transform one another. For example, changes in the understanding of the etiology, clinical manifestation, treatment modalities, and rehabilitation of mental disorders necessitate changes in the way law views issues related to mental health. A simple illustration of how these findings have informed law is the change in the vocabulary in law, an example from insanity to mental disorder ...
